As you install and remove software, run "temporary" programs, or simply visit certain web sites, junkware builds up in your PC, eating up its capacity. It's the computer equivalent of cholesterol.

New threats, known as "scumware", are virus-like programs not detected by most antivirus software, which wreak havoc with your PC.

They trick you into installing them, send your personal information, emails, surfing habits and more to advertisers and pop-up ads over, under, or even replacing web sites you try to access!

These programs require expert removal. The "official" removal instructions will often actually install alternative software on your PC. The tools available to help you offer highly technical choices, some of which are undesirable or even hazardous.
